

Helen Meyer Harrison and Newton Harrison, 1982.

NH: For instance, we always begin our work by taking a look at the belief structure of the place, and then by saying how much does it cost to believe this? How much did it cost to believe that? Then we'll take a look at the advantage and disadvantage structure of places; who's giving advantage, who's giving disadvantage. How much does it cost to give all this advantage in this place? Once we take a look at that, then we start to make decisions on utterly different levels than other people do.

HMH: And where is it happening? What is the real fabric of the place? Is it bricks and stones? Is it ideas? And what do you do at that interaction point? At the meeting of land and water; at the meeting of man, land and water. What happens there?